Energy Abstracts for Policy Analysis, 1981 Models of Technology Diffusion Paul A. Geroski, 1999 Technology and Enterprise Katrina Honeyman, Jordan Goodman, 1986 This book examines Isaac Holden's achievements both as an inventor and as a specialist woolcomber in France during the second half of the nineteenth century Early business failure in Bradford prompted Holden's move to France where by the late nineteenth century he had built up the largest woolcombing enterprise in Europe. The study further considers the process by which woolcombing was mechanised and specifies the means employed by the principle inventors to monopolise control of the new technology. By analysing Isaac Holden's technical and commercial exploits within the French worsted industry the authors have been able to confront the general question of technical change in the process of European industrialisation in the second half of the nineteenth century. This book should appeal to those interested in nineteenth century European economic history as well as those interested in business history and the history of technology. Even the cultural structure of these communities is heavily marked by the industrial environment in which they developed. However for over a decade now a major structural reorientation has been taking place and the old industrial structures have been disappearing. For various reasons the importance of large scale manufacturing companies has declined and as a result of intense development work with new ideas new entrepreneurs and new technology we have seen the rapid rise of small companies. In this context recent research has shown that universities playing an increasingly central role in regional development. Thus the continued development of the University of Karlstad is of significant regional and national interest. Although fairly small in an international perspective approximately 4000 students the university is expanding rapidly.
