Given the similarities in cover, layout and design, Exploring Grammar in Writing seems to be intended as a sister publication to Exploring Grammar in Context (Carter, Hughes and McCarthy, 2000). Both are pitched at a broadly defined upper-intermediate to advanced level [1]. Both provide equally rich sources for dip-in supplementary materials. In addition, where the latter goes from Grammar to Context, and is thus perhaps more suitable for reference, this textbook reverses the sequencing and goes from Writing (Context) to Grammar, making it equally suitable as a course book -- particularly for a short intensive writing course or as a writing component within a larger course.

The emphasis throughout the book is on choices open to the writer as governed by "real-world writing constraints and influencing factors" (p. vii). In the introduction Hughes announces her book's approach as Why not What, identifying three factors as crucial to a writer's grammar and style choices: the text's purpose, audience, and anticipated shelf-life. While the first two are widely recognised, the question of a text's expected lifespan is a thought-provoking yet rarely discussed element (at least in this type of book).

From an organisational perspective, the book is divided into four umbrella parts: Part One 'Writing for Different Readers'; Part Two 'Building Noun Phrases'; Part Three 'Adding More Information to the Sentence' and Part Four 'Sequencing and Focusing'. The sections are sub-divided into 20 units, covering a wide range of genres/text types. Along with the more traditional - Essays, Reports, Advertisements, and Business Letters, we can find Everyday Notes, Hobby Books, Blurbs, Encyclopaedias, and Greetings Cards [2]. It is also worth noting that separate units cover the particular characteristics of genres which although topic-related are stylistically distinctive. Aside from the more predictable distinction between Formal
