

The Five Types of Patients

You'll Care for as a Nurse

The Researcher

Not necessarily a negative; this type of patient will take the time to look up the best doctors and the latest treatments and is probably more up-to-date on news of any given clinical trial than you are. This type of patient expects to participate in decisions, often due to feeling that their research has entitled them to have a more collegial relationship with healthcare professionals.

The Independent Skeptic

One of the toughest to deal with, this type of patient is naturally skeptical about expert advice. One of the reasons for this is that such patients often form and rely on their own opinions after learning of a diagnosis or treatment options.

The Passive Dependent

Contrary to "The Skeptic," the passive patient prefers to leave all aspects of health care decisions in the hands of their medical professional. More than just blind faith or lethargy, this type of patient honestly feels that their nurse, nurse practitioner, or doctor knows best.

The Flexible

Perhaps the most efficient patient to interact with, this practical person has no interest in building a long-term relationship with their medical professional, or generating emotional support. They typically have infrequent health needs, only seeing a doctor when they have an immediate medical need.

The Open-minded "Explorer"

This person sees diagnosis and treatment as an honest partnership between doctor and patient with solid emotional support. This patient is more likely to want to explore the potential, spiritual, realm of healing and views medicine as more of an art than a science.
