

REVIEW: Why is it difficult to determine the prenatal effects of many environmental agents, such as drugs and pollution? (pp. 181–182)

It is difficult to determine the effects of many environmental agents on the developing organism because the harm done by teratogens is not always simple and straightforward. Rather, it depends on several factors, including dose, heredity, other negative influences, and age. For example, longer doses over longer time periods usually have more negative effects. The genetic makeup of the mother and the developing organism plays a vital role, as some individuals are better able than others to withstand harmful environments. The presence of several negative factors at once, such as additional teratogens, poor nutrition, and lack of medical care, can worsen the impact of a harmful agent. Moreover, the effects of teratogens vary with the age of the organism at time of exposure. Finally, the effects of teratogens go beyond immediate physical damage. Some health effects are subtle and may not show up for decades, and psychological consequences may occur indirectly as a result of physical damage.

CONNECT: How do teratogens illustrate the notion of epigenesis, presented in Chapter 2, that environments can affect gene expression? (See page 86 in review, 1 pg. 187)

Epigenesis refers to development resulting from ongoing, bidirectional exchanges between heredity and all levels of the environment. When positive, these exchanges alter gene expression in ways that enhance development. In contrast, harmful environments, such as prenatal exposure to teratogens, can cause modifications to gene expression, sometimes so profoundly that later experiences can do little to modify the affected characteristics. As an example, a child born with fetal alcohol syndrome (FAS) will not catch up in physical size during infancy or childhood, even when provided with an enriched diet, because the harmful environment created by prenatal alcohol exposure has affected the individual's gene expression. Similarly, intellectual disability associated with fetal alcohol spectrum disorder (FASD) is permanent.

APPENDIX: Nora, pregnant for the first time, believes that a few cigarettes and a glass of wine a day won't be harmful. Provide Nora with research-based reasons for not smoking or drinking. (pp. 189–190)

Nora should be told that both smoking and drinking alcohol can be harmful to the developing baby. Smoking harms the fetus in several ways. Nicotine, the addictive substance in tobacco, constricts blood vessels, lessens blood flow to the uterus, and causes the placenta to grow abnormally. This reduces the transfer of nutrients, so the fetus gains weight poorly. Nicotine also raises the concentration of carbon monoxide in the bloodstreams of both mother and fetus, disrupting the central nervous system and slowing body growth in the tissues of laboratory animals. Similar effects may occur in humans.

The best-known effect of smoking during pregnancy is low birth weight. Prenatal smoking also increases the risk of other serious consequences, including miscarriage, prematurity, cleft lip and palate, blood vessel abnormalities, impaired heart rate and breathing during sleep, infant death, and asthma and cancer later in childhood. Newborns of smoking mothers are less attentive to sounds, display more muscle tension, are more excitable when touched and visually stimulated, and more often have colic—disturbances that suggest subtle negative effects on brain development. Prematurely exposed children and adolescents tend to have shorter attention spans, difficulties with impulsivity and excitability, poorer memories, lower intelligence test scores, and higher levels of disruptive, aggressive behavior. “Passive smoking,” too, is related to low birth weight, infant death, childhood respiratory illnesses, and possible long-term asthma, learning, and behavior problems.

Prenatal maternal drinking is linked to fetal alcohol spectrum disorder (FASD), which encompasses a range of physical, mental, and behavioral outcomes, including fetal alcohol syndrome (FAS), partial fetal alcohol syndrome (p-FAS), and a less severe form, alcohol-related neurodevelopmental disorder (ARND). While varying in severity, all forms of FASD involve some physical, mental, and behavioral impairment. Because even mild drinking—less than one drink per day—is associated with reduced head size, slow body growth, and behavior problems, Nora should avoid alcohol, as well as tobacco, altogether.

REFLECT: If you had to choose five environmental influences to publicize in a campaign aimed at promoting healthy prenatal development, which ones would you choose, and why? (pp. 184–117)

This is an open-ended question, with no right or wrong answer.
