an instance of Marxism, therefore took part in the cultural avant-garde of Barcelona. Future avant-garde artists, just as the new location in Madrid after 1929 was also perceived.

In Spain as a whole, political change and economic modernization were in two phases, the first coinciding with the start of the republic in 1931 and lasting from 1931 to 1939, a period of political and economic paralysis, being unable to break the grip of the old regime. The second phase, from 1939 to 1975, was a period of political and economic modernization.

The Spanish Republic was a new regime in Europe, the first of its kind since the fall of authoritarianism and absolutism in the 19th century. The republic was governed at first by an alliance of liberal and reformist socialists, and later by a coalition of socialists and reformist socialists, and finally by a coalition of socialists and reformist socialists.

and right in the second republican elections of 1933. A large sector of the Socialists, disillusioned with the pace of democratic reformism, turned to authoritarianism, as they termed it. In the elections of October 1934 in which more than a thousand people were killed, the right then proceeded to reverse the course of the republic. In the elections of February 1936 a "Popular Front" of the more left-wing Republicans and a number of worker parties won a victory. From that point Spain entered a period of authoritarianism, which was characterized by increasing violence, strikes, and a loss of respect for property. This was the background to the civil war that began in July 1936.

of these varieties of authoritarianism, and finally—back where from. Moderate authoritarianism in Spain emerged as more or less a synthesis of authoritarianism and authoritarianism.
