

Social Networks and the Diffusion of Fertility Control

1 Overview

Theories of the fertility transition now routinely reserve a place for diffusion effects (Mason 1997). Such effects arise because individuals are themselves members of larger groups. The information that is held by group members, the choices they make, and the outcomes that flow from them—all these can exert a powerful influence on individual incentives to innovate. In settings in which fertility has been high, such innovation may take the form of modern contraceptive adoption and fertility limitation. Under certain conditions, the individual-to-group connections establish pathways along which such innovative demographic behavior can diffuse.

What empirical evidence supports the view that diffusion matters to fertility decline? As we will show, proponents can find in the fertility literature numerous hints and indirect suggestions of a role for diffusion. Until very recently, however, the available data were insufficient to withstand rigorous scientific scrutiny. Over the past several years, several groups of researchers have initiated longitudinal studies that promise to better illuminate the contribution of diffusion.¹

With the study of diffusion effects about to enter a new phase, this is an appropriate moment to take stock of what has been learned and to describe the new research directions that lie ahead. Our aim in this paper is threefold: to assemble the disparate concepts of the diffusion perspective into a coherent whole; to review the literature in and outside demography in the light of these concepts; and to present simulations and new data on the role of social networks, which we take to be one of the key mechanisms in diffusion processes. Throughout the paper, we illustrate the issues with applications to Ghana, one of the sites being explored in new longitudinal research. The effort to understand the specifics of the Ghanaian case requires that concepts and illustrations be drawn from the broader literature in social science and fertility change.

In our view, diffusion modeling can be regarded as a special case of multi-level modeling. It is distinctive in two respects: first, consideration of diffusion emphasizes a particular set of individual-to-group
