defensive field fortifications built by German infantrymen using local materials and includes rifle platoon positions trenches crew served weapon positions bunkers dugouts shelters and more      Notes on Field Fortification, Third Edition ,1916 According to whether they respond to strategic or tactical needs fortifications may be classified as strategic fortifications and tactical fortifications and are most frequently constructed in whole or in part during times of peace with all the resources of the technical arts to strengthen points whose strategic importance in the event of a war is clearly seen Occasionally however the necessity for strategic fortifications arises only at the outbreak or during the progress of a war to strengthen points the strategic value of which could not be foreseen Their construction more limited as to time involves expedients less comprehensive than in the case of works built during times of peace but still far in excess of those applicable in ordinary field worlds Strategic fortifications also are called permanent and semi permanent or provisional according to the time of their construction and the materials employed The various existing land fortifications in Europe are examples of permanent fortifications while the defenses of Washington DC in 1861 65 form a good example of provisional fortifications Both permanent and provisional fortifications are constructed by military engineers mainly with civilian labor and will not be further considered in these Notes Tactical fortifications are such as are generally constructed by the troops themselves to satisfy passing tactical needs They are also called field fortifications The Army field engineer school prepared this educational handbook for use by student officers Army School of the Line It provides a foundation of knowledge on permanent and semi permanent field fortifications that can be set up on a field of battle It describes how to set up field fortifications and illustrates the principles behind their use in defensive operations A Text-book on Field Fortification
