

des it is only to pump up the chosen one. That would be a serious error. This is the road of prayer, my daughters; to this does the spiritual marriage tend; to giving rise to works upon works. . . . Do you know what it means to be truly spiritual? It means to become slaves of God, to accept being branded with the iron, i.e., with his cross . . . ready to be sold by him as slaves of the whole world in the same way that he was" (Cantic, Seventh Missions, 4, 4-8).

In this way Teresa responded—not on the basis of theological speculation, but on that of her spiritual experience—to the most serious problems stirred up by the Protestant Reformation and by other deviant currents of her time, in which there emerged a dangerous mistrust towards all that could be considered to human, too little respectful of the greatness of God or of the purity of his grace.

In this "mistrust of the human" everything that could serve as "mediation" was paradoxically included and cast down: not only the exterior works of the Christian, the vocal prayers, the sacraments, and the cult of the saints, but even the person of the Blessed Virgin, the entire visible Church, and the very humanity of Christ.

At such a great distance in time, theologians should now know that the roots of the Protestant heresy all lay in the way in which some wanted to understand and interpret the Chalcedonian dogma, even if many today pretend to have forgotten it or vainly seek new translations under ecumenical pretenses.

Teresa certainly did not wish, nor was she able, to participate in the theological debate with her reflections, but she was, so to speak, touched by the contagion proceeding from the errors being diffused in her time. She reacted to this contagion with the healthy vigor that came to her from a robust spiritual experience whose development was caused for by Christ himself.

And thus a woman "without culture," who suffered from not being liturgical, became a Doctor for the entire Church, a doctor in contradistinction to many of the theologians of that time, and a doctor also for the theologians of our day.—Translated by Stephen Westworth Arndt □ nomianism and quietism. It has issued in theologies of impeccable trinitarian monotheism and in the heterodoxy of pantheism. Because mysticism has been both friend and foe to orthodox ecclesial Catholicism, it has always found within the Church both defenders and detractors. This divided sentiment has conditioned the posture of careful reserve which the Magisterium has consistently adopted towards the phenomenon of mysticism in general. Even when mystical experience manifests itself in a life of indisputable holiness, the Church has been reluctant to regard it as a sign of sanctity. Mystical grace, it holds, is distinct from sanctifying grace and thus cannot be construed as the source of exceptional virtue.² For this reason, the Church has scrupulously refused to inquire into mystical experience when deciding the question of canonization.³

In the modern era, the Church's official irresolution with regard to mysticism has come to veil an unequivocal skepticism on the part of most theologians and clerics concerning the phenomenon as a whole, and, in particular, psychophysical mystical experience. The prevailing inclination is either to view such experience as the product of psychic disorder or, while granting it the possibility of divine provenance, to dismiss it as meaningless for the larger community of faith. Thus, to a considerable extent embarrassed by or indifferent to the very subject of mysticism, contemporary Catholic theologians have tended to shun serious reflection upon the nature and significance of mystical experience. It is, therefore, striking to discover within the writings of Hans Urs von Balthasar a passionate preoccupation with the unfashionable topic of mysticism and its role within the Church.

Von Balthasar clearly considers a crucial part of his

The role of mysticism within the Church as conceived by Hans Urs von Balthasar

Claudia Lee

Authentic mysticism is a divine gift (charism) to the Church intended for the enlightenment of all its members.

Throughout its history, the Catholic Church has evinced an uneasy ambivalence toward the phenomenon of Christian mystical experience. Though mysticism has been a recurrent feature of the faith from its inception, the Church has cautiously and resolutely refrained from issuing a definitive pronouncement on the nature of true mystical experience. Though Church authorities have unhesitatingly censured mystical teachings whose "presuppositions or consequences involved errors in the doctrine of faith,"¹ they have declined to articulate other than a norma negatio with respect to the mystical life. So circumspect a stance acquires intelligibility in light of the curious contradiction mysticism has historically proved to be for the Church. It has been the wellspring of both saints and schismatics, the hallmark of luminaries and lunatics alike. It has been a force for the active upbuilding of the body of Christ and an impetus to the counter-currents of sectarianism, anti-genuine mysticism which has valuable implications for the Church. It is precisely as an ecclesially relevant charism that mysticism assumes critical importance, von Balthasar asserts. To interpret mystical experience as an essentially private concern, as theologians have traditionally done, is to misapprehend the phenomenon altogether. This fallacy, von Balthasar contends, has conditioned much of the conventional disdain for mysticism. For, if what the mystic perceives has no pertinence to others and is insusceptible of authentication, it is easily discounted as inconsequential or illusory. The marginal status to which mysticism has historically been consigned within Christianity is the result of the persistent tendency to classify the mystic's experience as essentially esoteric and individual.

Von Balthasar appeals for a revision of this bias by arguing that authentic mysticism is a divine gift (charism) to the Church intended for the enlightenment of all its members. The content of mystical experience is meant to be transmitted by the recipient to the believing community for its collective enrichment. Only by regarding mysticism as a spiritual resource capable of universal exploitation, insists von Balthasar, can we counter "the fatalist move customary since the time of the Fathers (as a reaction against Montanism), whereby . . . mystical experience is held to be fundamentally questionable in the extreme."² If mysticism were theologically meaningless or ecclesially irrelevant, as its critics aver, "Why then," von Balthasar challenges, "does God nevertheless, time after time, condescend to such undertakings?"³ The gifts of God are infallibly destined for the people of God. The individual Christian, as a member of the body of Christ, is graded in order that the whole may be enhanced. To deny the ecclesial impor-
