

Flowers

Flowers are unique structures that house the reproductive organs of angiosperm plants. Although all flowers share similar underlying functions, which enable them to produce seed, they have evolved an enormous variety of shapes, sizes, colors, and fragrances. In cultivation, this diversity has been further enhanced by selective breeding.

Structure and function

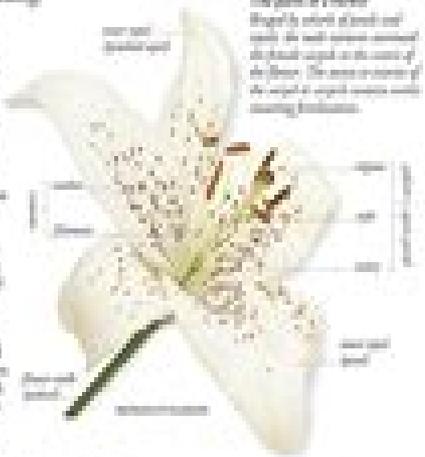

All parts of a flower arise from the cotyledon or thalypodium of the main stem (epicotyl). Thus, flowers consist of a shoot of indeterminate growth that usually succumb to its own shoot after the stem has grown several centimeters. In some monocots, the shoot bud like the petals, and the stem abscises around the rim of the flower bud on the leaves a week or so after the stem has grown several centimeters. At the center of the flower, three main reproductive organs (stamens) surround the female part (the pistil). Collectively known as the gynoecium, these consist of the ovary (the ovule-bearing part) and the style (the tube with stigma) that may have one or more stigmas. These may be free or fused, which means the pistil consists of a single body or an ovary containing one or more ovaries. Once the ovule has been fertilized by pollen, the stigma and style usually wither and fall away, the ovary then swells to form the seed and new cotyledons for the young.

Although many plants are able to produce flowers, most have mechanisms that encourage cross-pollination – the transfer of pollen from one flower to another. The various mechanisms include the male, improving pollination; there is an opening in the structure, some pollinators are used to produce flowers with one or several flowers on a stem.

Flowerless structures
Some non-pollinated flowers, and a few non-pollinated flowers, have a long, narrow, and sometimes green tube that holds a single flower among others.

DIVERGENT STRUCTURES

Flowers have evolved through time into many different forms. In some, the petals and sepals are fused together, forming a single structure. In others, the petals and sepals are separate. The structure of the flower is determined by the way the ovary is fused to the stem. In some, the ovary is fused to the stem, and the petals and sepals are separate. In others, the ovary is separate from the stem, and the petals and sepals are fused together.
