

Equity-Centered Decisionmaking through Health in All Policies

What Funders Need to Know & Do

Over the last two decades, leaders in diverse communities across the United States have experimented with various cross-sector governance and policymaking approaches to incorporate health equity considerations more formally into decisionmaking. These tools and frameworks, like Health Impact Assessment (HIA)<sup>1</sup> and Health in All Policies (HiAP), arose from decades of research showing how health is influenced by a wide range of social, economic, and environmental factors, frequently referred to as the "social determinants of health."<sup>2</sup> All government agencies and departments, not just health departments or healthcare providers, make decisions that shape these factors.

Health in All Policies is a "collaborative approach to improving the health of all people by incorporating health considerations into decisionmaking across sectors and policy areas."<sup>3</sup> Core elements of this approach include "defining mutually beneficial goals, cross-sector collaboration, stakeholder engagement, making changes to policies and systems, and the promotion of health and health equity."<sup>4,5</sup> Health departments often, but not always, take the lead on HiAP. This brief summarizes themes from research led by Onside Partners and makes recommendations for how funders can further support the expansion of this practice in the United States.

What is the relationship between Health in All Policies and health equity?

To ensure that all people have the resources to truly be healthy, we must fix or eliminate the systems and structures that unfairly keep people of color, low-income people, and other marginalized people from accessing the essential resources that promote wellbeing, like healthy food, safe housing, and reliable transportation.<sup>6</sup> Tackling health inequities requires multi-sector collaboration and coordinated changes to policies and systems, which HiAP facilitates. Many people using HiAP report that it enables their agencies and wider communities to tackle racial and health inequities, including in more politically conservative places where talking directly about racism or health equity might shut down conversation, rather than open a dialogue.<sup>7</sup>
