Abstract

Speech audiometry uses various types of perceptual tests for the diagnostics of hearing impairment. One of them is a matrix test (Akeroyd et al., 2015), originally prepared for adults, which fully respects the phonological rules of a language, including neutralizations of phonological oppositions based on distinctive features. The shorter version of this test, a so-called reduced matrix test, can be helpful in speech audiometry focusing on children and infants. The goal of our paper is to find out if distinctive features of phonemes are important in the process of first language acquisition. If yes, reduced matrix test aimed at children and infants can be created as a mere simplification of the matrix designed for adults (Panocová & Gregová, 2019). However, if distinctive features do not affect first language acquisition, completely new matrix has to be prepared for infants. The research was based on the longitudinal observation of two infants whose mother tongue is Slovak.

1. INTRODUCTION

A matrix test is one of the latest types of perceptual tests used in speech audiometry to diagnose the degree and nature of hearing impairment. The first matrix test² was introduced by Hagerman (1982), and later it was improved by Wagner et al. (1999a,b,c). Detailed guidelines for constructing the matrix test and comparing it to the other type of speech test, the digit triplet test, as developed by the ICRA (International Collegium of Rehabilitative Audiology) working group on Multilingual Speech Tests, can be found in Akeroyd et al. (2015). Following Akeroyd et al. (2015, p. 3), the main linguistic characteristics of the matrix test are as follows:

² Matrix test "consists of five-word long sentences, each of which has the same syntax, but is not necessarily meaningful, i.e. the semantic content is unpredictable (e.g. "Thomas wins eight red shoes"; "Kathy bought two dark spoons")" (Akeroyd et al., 2015, p. 3). The test is used for speech intelligibility testing.
