

... They require cross-pollination by other varieties. Grapes bloom late in the season and seldom are blossoms injured by late spring frosts; however, a late injury will sometimes kill buds that would otherwise produce fruiting wood during the summer.

The flowers of the apple are true hermaphrodites. The blossom has five stigmas. If each one is fertilized better apples will be produced. The June drop of apples in many orchards is a direct result of poor pollination. Unless three or more woods are developing, the young apples will not reach true size and will no doubt drop immature sometime before harvest time. Most apple varieties require cross-pollination. Those not requiring it usually produce more and better fruit when crossing occurs. In normal biogeographic years, from 5% to 10% of the blossoms, if properly pollinated, will usually result in a satisfactory fruit set for the tree. It should be remembered that about 90% of the fruit set of apples is the result of bees actively during the period the tree is in full bloom.

The pollinator bees should make up from one-fourth to one-third of the total number of bees at the planting. It is possible to have the pollinator tree of a variety equally as productive and valuable as the principal variety. They should bloom at the same time and have plenty of mature pollen. They should be self-fertile or receive pollen from the principal variety.
