

HISTOLOGY GUIDE

A tissue is a group of cells that are similar in structure and function with multiple tissue types represented in an organ such as the kidneys or muscles. Histology, the study of tissues, requires the use of microscopes; therefore, the first part of this laboratory exercise is familiarizing yourself with the microscope. Animal tissues are categorized into four main tissue types.

1. Epithelial Tissue

Epithelial tissues form the coverings and linings of our body such as our skin or the lining of blood vessels. Connective tissue is a diverse tissue type that binds, protects, and supports organs. It includes tissues such as fat, blood, and bone. Muscle tissue is tissue that is specialized to contract. Muscle tissue is used in movement and includes skeletal muscles and the heart muscle. Nervous tissue includes the brain, spinal cord, and nerves. It is tissue that contains neurons, which are specialized cells that communicate with other cells in our body by electrochemical signals. Epithelial Tissue General Features of Epithelial Tissues Epithelial tissue forms the lining of both external and internal body surfaces. Examples of epithelial tissue include the outer layer of the skin, the inner lining of the digestive and respiratory tracts, and the lining of blood vessels. It consists of tightly packed cells of one or more layers.

Classification of Epithelia Types of epithelial tissue always have two-word names with the first describing the number of cellular layers and the second describing the shape of the cells. If cells are arranged in a single layer, the epithelium is called simple; if the cells are arranged in two or more layers, the epithelium is called stratified. There are three shapes of epithelial cells: flat or squamous, cube-like or cuboidal, and tall and rectangular or columnar. Hence, simple cuboidal epithelia are comprised of a single layer of cube-shaped cells whereas stratified squamous is comprised of multiple layers of flattened pancake-looking cells.

Types of epithelial tissues

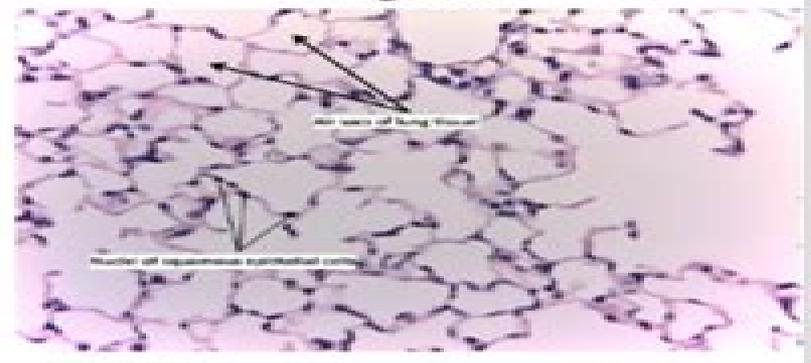

Simple Squamous Epithelium

Appearance: Single layer of flattened cells

Function: Highly permeable, often involved in passage of small molecules by diffusion or filtration

Location: Alveoli of the lungs, capillaries

Lung 400X
