Congress. House. Committee on Science. Subcommittee on Technology,1995 Technology Transfer H.F. Davidson,M. Cetron,J.D. Goldhar,2011-10-24 Several formerly independent trends including the increasing rate of technological change the demand for greater efficiency and productivity in R D and innovation and the need for applying technology to the solution of pressing social and economic problems have recently begun to reinforce each other resulting in renewed interest in technology transfer activities and research The proliferation of research efforts in the U S and Western Europe increased corporate and governmental efforts to develop mechanisms and incentives for transfer and the growing closeness between transfer and innovation studies led to the decision to convene a meeting with representatives from both research and practice in transfer and innovation in order to establish a state of the art baseline and to promote discussion between the researchers and practitioners from all sectors in the hope that new research will better reflect the realities of current practice and new mechanisms created by practitioners might be improved through the use of knowledge generated from research How close we came to the second goal is a question which must be left to the future The proceedings which follow reflect the first goal If the papers and conclusions occasionally appear to be contradictory or repetitive or naive or overly pessimistic or simply based upon too narrow a base of research or experience they are an accurate reflection of both the state of the art and the lack of communications among individuals and organizations involved in similar activities
