

Configurational properties consist of beach's water depth, slope's angle, form profile, while mass flow variables encompass deposition, erosion and transport rates.

Geomorphic processes refer to the diverse physical and chemical avenues through which the surface of the earth experience modifications. These processes are compelled by forces originating outside the earth (extraterrestrial processes), in atmosphere and near the surface of the earth (exogene/ exogenic processes) and inside the earth (endogene/ endogenic processes). The geomorphic processes include transferring and transforming processes linked to ice, gravity, water, wind and weathering (Huggett, 2011). Geomorphic enquiries rely on linkages between process and form; each aspect, form or process, influences the other. Therefore, geomorphic process influences, and is in turn influenced by geological processes, atmospheric processes and biological processes (Huggett, 2011).

There exist four approaches utilized in landforms study. First, geographical spatial science approach which focuses on landforms' systems and landforms' characterization. Second, functional (process-form) approach which builds upon physics and chemistry. Third, landform evolution method, that bases on historical geological science. The fourth approach is environmentally sensitive to landscapes, landforms, and landforms' systems of the earth's surface.

Historical geomorphology is defined as the study of landforms' changes or evolution of landforms in excess of long and medium timescales, generally beyond a human being's experience such as millennia and centuries. It draws in the dimension of history with all its methods and assumptions, basing majorly on the sedimentary record and land surface forms
