Abstract.

Recruiting and retaining females within science, engineering and technology continues to challenge many European Higher Education Institutions. This study looks at female self-perceptions relating to effective research work and career progression. Focus groups are used to examine the attitudes and experiences of females, and a questionnaire used to explore perceptions in four main skills areas: group work; communication; personal awareness; and project planning and management. The study indicates consistent female concerns on issues pertaining to effective female role models, negative work-role stereotypes and the work-life balance of an academic career. For all four skills areas, the average confidence scores of the female participants fell below that of males, but these differences were only statistically significant for perceptions on group work and communication skills, and prior to an intense skills development course. Based on these findings, a student workshop on gender issues has been developed, an outline of which is presented.

Keywords: women in engineering; gender issues; skills perceptions

1. INTRODUCTION

Concerns of gender disparities in, for example, student attrition and career progression [1], positive college experiences [2] and general barriers to participation [3, 4] have been widely reported. Recruiting and retaining females within science, engineering and technology (SET) continues to challenge many European Higher Education Institutions: compared to males, fewer female undergraduates continue into the postgraduate, postdoctoral and academic levels. This trend is not limited to academic realms, with evidence to suggest that:

“a continuing disproportionate lack of women in most scientific and engineering disciplines, especially at the upper reaches of the professions” [5]

Several possible reasons for such an occurrence have been postulated in the literature, and include issues pertaining to: a lack of female role models; implicit gender differences in communication and collaboration styles which may disadvantage females in established, male-dominated groups; subtle forms of discrimination; and the real and perceived challenges associated with balancing a work and family life.

A lack of female role models in engineering education is argued to adversely influence the self-esteem of female students [6] and prevent the formation of a female engineering identity [7]. The lack of visibility of role models at higher performance
