

Family Therapy Interventions

Interventions

Family therapy interventions are diverse, reflecting family systems' complexities and their challenges. These interventions are rooted in various therapeutic approaches, each offering unique tools to address issues, enhance communication, and foster healthy relationships within families.

Structural and strategic family therapy

Both structural and strategic approaches are foundational in systemic family therapy. There is a focus on identifying and altering intergenerational family dynamics that maintain, create, or exacerbate issues (Wampler et al., 2020).

- Structural: Recognizes the importance of understanding the individual within their social context. It emphasizes how individuals do not exist in isolation but rather about the family, which helps to drive productive change. Hence, problems in families are typically distributed and often a result of a dysfunctional hierarchy or poor functioning within subsystems.
- Strategic: It suggests that change happens before understanding. For lasting change to occur, there needs to be an understanding of the family interactional patterns and shifts in perception within these.

Psychodynamic/psychoeducational therapy

This focuses on exploring family members' past relationships and experiences to gain insight into present issues. It can be used to educate families about mental illness and other challenging behavior patterns, with a continued focus on the family as a whole (Metcalf, 2011).

Narrative family therapy

This type of therapy is prevalent today. It allows family members to share their stories in a respectful manner, assuming that everyone is an expert in their own life. Issues are looked at from a different angle, and individuals are encouraged to support other family members and unite against the issue together (Goldenberg, 2017).

Systemic/systematic family therapy

It recognizes the connectedness between family members, highlighting how individual issues are influenced and embedded within the family structure (Goldenberg, 2017). This approach helps identify dysfunctional patterns within the family that contribute to individual problems, offering suggestions on how to make the family unit more substantial and more supportive.

Bowenian family therapy

This considers family issues by looking at both past relationships and the family as a unit (Goldenberg, 2017). Eight interlocking concepts are considered: differentiation of self, triangles, family projection process, multigenerational transmission process, societal regression, nuclear family emotional system, emotional cutoff, and sibling position.

Behavioral and cognitive-behavioral family therapy

These cognitive interventions encourage individuals to identify aspects of their thinking that contribute to negative behavioral and emotional responses within the family (Wampler et al., 2020). They also test the validity of cognitions and swap unhelpful thoughts with helpful ones.
