NORMAN HERZ and ERVAN G. GARRISON. 1998. Oxford University Press, England. vii + 343 pp., 99 figures, 42 tables, notes, index. $75.00 (cloth).

In their foreword, Norman Herz and Ervan Garrison point out that the scope of most geoarchaeology books has been limited to sediments, soils, and geomorphology. In this book, they seek to provide archaeologists with a more comprehensive summary of geological techniques that have been successfully applied to archaeological problems. Following a brief introductory chapter, the authors divide the remainder of the book into four parts: "The Archaeological Site and Its Environment," "Dating Techniques," "Site Exploration," and "Artifact Analysis."

The first section contains two chapters. Chapter 2 focuses on geomorphology and stresses the importance of using geomorphological methods to reconstruct past landscapes, decipher site formation processes, and preserve archaeological sites threatened by erosion or weathering processes. Chapter 3 covers pertinent aspects of sedimentology and pedology. Also discussed are paleoclimate indicators found in soils and sediments, including pollen, plant macrofossils, and phytoliths.

The four chapters of section 2 present a plethora of dating techniques presently available to archaeologists. These methods are separated into four groups, with a chapter devoted to each. Chapter 4 covers chemical methods including F-U-Ni (Fluorine, Uranium, and Nitrogen) tests, amino acid dating, cation-ratio (rock varnish) dating, and obsidian hydration dating. Chapter 5 is devoted to radioactive methods including uranium dating, potassium-argon dating, and argon-argon dating. Fission-track dating, alpha-recoil track dating, thermoluminescence dating, electron spin resonance dating, radiocarbon dating, and chlorine-36 dating are addressed in chapter 6, which covers radiation damage, cosmogenic, and atom-counting methods. And finally, chapter 7 presents several miscellaneous techniques including dendrochronology, archaeomagnetic dating, and tephrochronology.

The third section (Site Exploration) consists of two chapters. Chapter 8 covers geophysical methods including seismic, electromagnetic, magnetic, ground-penetrating radar, microgravity, thermography, and magnetic susceptibility techniques. Chapter 9 describes phosphate analysis as a survey tool to locate and delimit (both laterally and horizontally) areas of past human activity.

Section 4 (Artifact Analysis) contains five chapters. Chapter 10 provides an introduction to rocks and minerals and emphasizes the necessity and utility of accurate identification of lithic raw materials. Chapter 11 presents a wide variety of instrumental analytical techniques (e.g., neutron activation analysis, X-ray diffraction, X-ray fluorescence, electron microprobe, etc.) that can determine the chemical signatures of artifacts so that raw material sources can be inferred. Chapter 12 discusses analytical methods useful in metallurgy technology studies. Geochemical and petrographic analysis techniques applicable to ceramic studies are covered in chapter 13. The section concludes (chapter 14) with a discussion of how various stable isotope ratios can be utilized in reconstructing paleoclimate and paleodiet and in sourcing marble, obsidian, gypsum, and lead.

Despite their acknowledgment that most archaeologists (the intended audience) have limited backgrounds in the physical sciences, Herz and Garrison's discussions of many techniques are larded with undefined chemistry, physics jargon, and excessive formulas that make for tedious reading. Elegant, concise descriptions and explanations are rare, and the relevance of many techniques to archaeology is unclear, further hindering comprehension of much of the material presented.

A lack of attention to detail detracts from the book as a whole. Inaccurate definitions, especially of soil terms, are misleading. Many sections are poorly organized, with paragraphs comprised of choppy, loosely connected facts and ideas. Frequently, poorly constructed sentences required a reread. Headings are not always relevant to the prose that follows. Most of the figures are poorly reproduced, incompletely labeled, and are not always very relevant to the associated text, limiting their elucidative value.
