

GUIDE TO WRITING FORMAL ACADEMIC PAPERS

Steven Horwitz

As you hold this in your hand, you are probably wondering why it takes over eight pages to tell you how to write a paper and why some idiot would take the time to write about it. The answer to both is that the purpose of this is to make you into better writers and to help you become better able to articulate your perspective on what you learn both in this course and at SLU. The point is not to give you pages of rules and regulations, but to give you the things you need to know to create and present your ideas in a legitimate and persuasive way. When I read your papers, I assume that you have read this guide in its entirety. Failure to comply with anything stated below may adversely affect your grade.

RESEARCH PAPERS AND TOPIC PAPERS

Most non-fiction class papers fall into one of two categories: research papers or topic papers. For research papers, you are expected to pick a topic and engage in independent research (usually in the library or online) to find information and sources. For topic papers, you are usually given a topic, or several to choose from, based on the course readings and discussion and are expected to make use of those resources (rather than outside ones) to write your paper. Almost everything in this guide applies equally to both kinds of papers.

No matter which kind of paper you are writing you must make use of the course readings. Those readings are there to help you understand material both in and out of the course. Why would we assign them if we didn't expect you to make use of them? The whole point of either type of paper is to see how well you can apply what you have learned in the course. Doing so requires that you make use of the ideas and readings from it. When you finish your paper, check to see if you have course readings cited and in your bibliography. If not, chances are good that what you have done is probably not too relevant to the course. And don't forget: course readings must be cited properly like everything else.

THESIS STATEMENTS

Whether your paper involves outside research or not, you need to have a thesis statement. Once you have an idea of what you want to say, and have some grasp of what others have said, you need to make your ideas more concrete by coming up with a thesis sentence(s). A thesis indicates the main argument of your paper. The point of any class paper is to persuade your reader that you have something to say that he or she should care about. A good thesis should be debatable, specific, and concise. The following is not a good thesis:

- The history of the Soviet Union is very interesting and complex.

Lots of things are interesting and complex and I challenge you to find a country whose history isn't. While it is concise and somewhat specific, this thesis is not really debatable.
